Daylilies

Ir

Dear Gardening Friends:

Most of you now know that daylilies can be relied upon without the fuss and bother of combating insects and disease. Although they are a hardy root plant, the flowers are as large and beautiful as those of the bulb lilies. A proper selection of varieties will furnish bloom from Spring to frost. Those who make them the backbone of their summer gardens find that labor is greatly reduced.

Do not plant in complete shade or in poorly drained locations where plants would be standing in a wet area during the winter. They need some sun. Morning sun and afternoon shade is ideal. Morning sun conditions the flower to take sun all day far better than morning shade does. Although drought resistant, extra added moisture during blooming period will enhance beauty and bloom.

Plant daylilies with the junction point of roots and foliage 1 to 1½ inches below soil surface, and space plants 1½ to 2 ft. apart to avoid crowding after they form clumps. If soil is hard clay, or the reverse too sandy, condition it with well rotted manure. Mix ½ glass of super-phosphate in the soil when planting. A handful of commercial fertilizer, low in nitrogen (2-10-10 or 4-12-12) scratched lightly into the soil around each plant twice in the growing season is also helpful. Daylilies can be transplanted or moved anytime if the water used contains 1 teaspoon of Hyponex to the gallon.

After the first winter the plant's own foliage will act as a mulch. The first winter, apply a mulch, but do not use soggy material. A nest of excelsior is good.

The foliage of some varieties is evergreen in the South. Catalogs show these as evergreen. These are somewhat less hardy North and can easily be lost if wintered in the North and transplanted before recovery from winter injury. If wintered in the North, plants that are classed as evergreen, should not be transplanted or sold before June. Northern customers wanting an evergreen variety in early Spring should obtain it from the South.

We use care to keep our plants true to name and will replace any found to be otherwise, but will not be responsible for more than the original cost.
